Strange things are happening in Dysart.

There are a number of projects on the go, all of which are designed to visually improve Dysart and provide better amenities. Some new housing developments are planned, but most obvious at the moment is the installation of a number of Art Projects. The first of these to go up is a collection of tall wooden pillars beside the harbour. They first appeared about two weeks ago and last week they were painted in various shades of grey and powder blue. White chips have now been delivered and presumably will be spread out around the base. I attach two photos below; one before they were painted, and the other as they appeared on Friday. I will add more as things progress.

How long they will last is anyones guess, since recently there have been a number of incidents of vandalism around the harbour area with some boats being damaged and bench seats being ripped out and thrown into the sea. One was later recovered on the beach further along the coast.
